OCLC Number: (OCoLC)61283991 Subject: Computer security -- Government policy -- United States -- Evaluation. Excerpt: . . . Our analysis of IG, agency, and GAO reports has shown that agencies have not always effectively implemented controls to allow only authorized individuals to read, alter, or delete data. Twenty-three of 24 major agencies had access control weaknesses. We identified weaknesses in controls such as user accounts, passwords, and access rights. For example, users created passwords that were common words. Using such words as passwords increases the possibility that an attacker could guess the password and gain access to the account. Also, agencies did not always deactivate unused accounts to prevent them from being exploited by malicious users. In addition, agencies have weaknesses in the controls that prevent unauthorized access to their networks. For example, at one agency, we found an excessive number of connections to the Internet. Each such connection could provide a path for an attacker into the agency's network. Agencies often lacked effective physical barriers to access, including locked doors, visitor screening, and effective use of access cards. Inadequate access controls diminish the reliability of computerized data and increase the risk of unauthorized disclosure, modification, and use. As a result, critical information held by the federal government is at heightened risk of access by unauthorized persons - individuals who could obtain personal data ( such as taxpayer information ) to perpetrate identity theft and commit financial crimes. Software change controls ensure that only authorized and fully tested Software Change Controls Were software is placed in operation. These controls, which also limit and Not Always in Place monitor access to powerful programs and sensitive files associated with computer operations, are important in providing reasonable assurance that...
