Tis now the silent midnight hour, O! come, soft sleep, thy influence lend-, Again let fancys magic power Present my husband, lover, friend. Let him whose absence breaks my heart, Again in pleasing dreams appear; Though forced by fate, severe, to part, Oh! let me fancy he is near. Last night, sweet sleep, thou wast most kind, My dreams were as Elysium gay; Methought I gatherd flowers, to bind The brows of him whos far away And then I hung upon his arm, And claspd his hand with fond caress And heard that voice that used to charm Tell me of love and happiness. But soon I woke, and cruel fears Dispelld the fleeting, fancied bliss, And from my cheek, the bitterest tears Chasd the imaginary kiss. i But memory, thou art ever true; Waking, I cannot fly from thee; Thou bringst to mind that sad adieu, When Frederic tore himself from me Thou showest me that dear faded cheek, Where roses glowd in happier times; Thou telst me, that alone and weak, He seeks for health in milder climes. Thou bringst to mind that ardent love Which nought could ever turn aside; Which rose each obstacle above, And every power, but Heaven, defied. Each wretched day, each sleepless night, But brings me nearer to the grave; While he, for whom each toil was light, Is far away, and cannot save. O were it not, that on my...
